This quote by Charles Dickens is a motivational call to action against procrastination. It emphasizes that when we delay or avoid tasks, we are ultimately stealing our own time. By using the word "collar", Dickens urges us to catch and confront procrastination, implying that we should take immediate action to tackle our responsibilities and make the most of the hours we have. It serves as a reminder to seize the present moment and avoid putting off tasks that could be accomplished now instead of later.

Procrastination manifests in various forms, from the simple act of postponing a task to the more elaborate avoidance of responsibility through distractions and idle pursuits. It often stems from a combination of factors, including fear of failure, lack of motivation, and a misguided belief that we can accomplish more by hesitating and delaying.

However, the reality is far from comforting. Procrastination, in its various forms, is a time-wasting monster that robs us of the opportunity to achieve our goals and live our lives to the fullest. The tasks we postpone loom larger and become more daunting with each passing day, creating a vicious cycle of procrastination and self-sabotage.

The solution lies in recognizing the thief for what it is and taking decisive action. We must collar procrastination, not by allowing it to paralyze us, but by facing our fears and embracing the power of discipline.
